THE CEDED DISTRICTS

A Guide to the Records from 1800 to 1835

Part I—INTRODUCTION

THE tract of country known as the Ceded Districts came under British control in 1800. It then formed the single collectorate of Bellary. In 1807 it was divided into the two collectorates of Bellary and Cuddapah and so remained until 1858 when Kurnool was constituted into a separate district, Anantapur being formed in 1882. This book deals with the records of the Collectors' offices between 1800 and 1835 and therefore of the old Bellary district for the whole period and of the old Cuddapah district from 1807 to 1835.

In preparing the index it has been kept in view that the student's researches will probably be directed towards one or more of the following objects of study: biography, local history, departmental history, special subjects and general history. The materials at his command fall into three classes, the original records, derived material and books. He should study the books first because they are an epitome of the labours of his forerunners in the same field who have already performed for him the task of collating facts by means of map, tabulation or narrative.

He should then turn his attention to the derived material which consists of calendars, press lists, indexes, catalogues and literal reprints of the original documents. Of these no calendars or press lists have been prepared for the Ceded Districts. Since the preparation of the last catalogue the district records between 1821 and 1835 have been deposited in the Records Office. The catalogue has therefore been revised and extended. A list of reprints has been added and the main portion of the handbook consists of an index to the contents of the original volumes. In short, this guide aims at providing the student with a brief but comprehensive critical apparatus for the study of the original material.

The Collector is not merely a departmental officer, but is the representative of Government in the district. The records, therefore, deal with a wide range of subjects, with land revenue, military operations, police and magistracy, land customs, finance and matters postal and political. But the student should remember that their value is not so great as their scope. They may be relied on to tell the truth but not the whole truth. They exhibit the mechanical accuracy and stiffness of an automaton without the warm passions and emotions that inform all human affairs. Seldom do these old volumes strike the personal note. For that we must turn to private journals, to letters to friends or enemies, or demi-official letters, perhaps, long since passed into oblivion. The student must therefore be warned against accepting the part for the whole or from allowing his judgment to be unduly influenced by the inhuman propriety of these official documents.

Part II—HISTORICAL SKETCH

The Ceded Districts embrace an area of about 26,000 square miles —half the size of England. Their population is mainly Telugu and their shape is that of a wedge driving westwards into the Kanarese-speaking country and separating modern Mysore from the Bombay Presidency. They have always formed a frontier district, the zone within which the pressure of northern invasions came up against the effective opposition of the south. Vijayanagar became the capital and military outpost of a great southern empire which lasted long enough to break the first shock of Muhammadan invasion. In the sixteenth century the empire fell to pieces and by 1800 the Ceded Districts came into the hands of the British who, by breaking the power of Mysore, had completed the work of Vijayanagar and brought to an end the era of chronic misrule.

The first Principal Collector was Major Munro, a man distinguished both as a Military and a Civil officer. When he took charge his time was divided between collecting the revenue and subduing recalcitrant Poligars. These were the hereditary superior Police and Revenue officials of the former Government. They were generally unwilling to pay their dues to the Company or to disband a militia which, too often, preyed upon the community whose duty it was to protect. The records contain a valuable account of the military operations against the Poligars. They give us glimpses also of preparations for war against the Marathas in 1803 and 1817 and of Pindari raids in 1816. For in the earlier years large bodies of troops garrisoned the Ceded Districts and marched and counter-marched through them, and the Civil officers had many duties connected with military posts, supply and transport.

The whole period covered by these records may be divided into two main portions ; the first, from 1800 to 1820, covers the attempts made to establish hereditary renters as collectors of land revenue and its final failure ; the second, from 1820 to 1835, sees the gradual substitution of the ryotwari system in its modern form.

Since the establishment of the Vijayanagar Kingdom—for at least three centuries—the ruling power had collected the land revenue in money and not in kind. Theoretically it represented the Government's share of the harvest commuted into money ; actually it was a rack-rent. Munro took the demand made by the Hyderabad Government in each district (i.e., taluk) and distributed it among the villages ; the village demand he distributed, in turn, among the individual ryots. As the village accounts were frequently unreliable, he undertook a survey and classification of soils, deducing from this the relative capacity of each ryot and checking his results by full consultation with the ryots themselves. But the assessments were too high and the attempt to maintain them at this level for the first twenty years of the century seriously impoverished the district. The margin of profit to the ryot was so low that the migration of farmers from one village to another seeking better terms became an embarrassment to local Revenue officers.

This early ryotwari system differed somewhat from its present descendant. The ryot was not allowed to relinquish his land freely. If he gave it up, he was compelled to give up equal quantities of good and bad land. The Collectors granted remissions annually on dry land as well as on wet, for the assessment really represented, not as it does to-day an amount which the ryot should be able to pay in any normal year, but a maximum attainable only in a year of exceptional prosperity. Finally the ryots were not only severally but jointly responsible for the payment of the land revenue. These regulations were almost necessary under the unduly high demand which, owing to pressure from the Home Government, was made on the district in the early nineteenth century. With the establishment of a proper judicial system and the gradual relief of this pressure, Revenue officers were no longer driven to follow principles repugnant to British ideas of freedom.

Having once divided the arable land into survey fields and fixed maximum rates of assessment on them, Munro apparently intended his ryotwari settlement to be permanent. He does not seem to have considered the possible effect on the position of the ryot of a marked fall in prices or on the revenues of Government of a marked rise. But whatever may have been his intention, the Court of Directors decreed otherwise. They tried to impose on the district a permanent settlement called a village settlement, differing from a zamindari settlement only in the fact that the size of each estate was limited to a revenue village. It failed because, owing to the high level of assessment, the renters were unable to fulfil their obligations. When by 1820 Government had reverted to the ryotwari system, they were free to decide this question of permanance in the way they thought best.

Part VI—THE INDEX

To include all papers of possible value would swell the index far beyond the limits of this volume. But the student will find under each main head references to a fair number of important papers. These main heads have been selected, with a few additions, from the list, Appendix A in the Madras District Office Manual. Comprehensive subjects have been divided up between several different main heads. Thus 'Land Revenue System' includes such heads as 'Assessment,' 'Collection,' 'Relinquishment,' 'Survey and Settlement,' etc. The Key to the Index groups together under a few main heads the numerous minor subjects which stand separately.

The main head 'Accounts' includes all indexed references to accounts, to whatever branch they belong. A few such heads, owing to their special importance, have been indexed also under their special subject heads.

The main head 'Jurisdiction' embraces administrative powers whether considered in an effectual or local aspect.

'Personal names' includes the names of individuals, the interest in whom is mainly personal.

The arrangement under sub-heads is chronological. Unless otherwise stated a sub-head refers to a particular case and not to a general rule or order.

Proper names are spelt generally on the modern system. The following abbreviations have been used :—

Civil Service ... ... C.S.
Fasli ... ... F.

The numbers in thick type stand for the catalogue numbers of volumes or bundles, those in thin type for page numbers, and those in brackets for dates. A date is common to all page numbers following it, until another date occurs.

Reference should be made to the printed index, Volume 278 B of the Records Office Catalogue, of the correspondence of Sir Thomas Munro from 1799 to 1826, the year before his death.
